

1. Leonardo Da Vinci

"Learning never exhausts the mind. It only ignites it."

I am Leonardo da Vinci — a painter, a thinker, an inventor... but above all, a curious soul. In a world bound by limits, I lived unshackled — chasing birds to understand flight, studying corpses to know life, and sketching machines that the world would not see for centuries.

They called me a genius, but I was merely an observer — of nature, of motion, of the silent music in human thought. I believed that art and science are not rivals, but lovers dancing together on the canvas of creation.

I painted The Last Supper with devotion, and Mona Lisa with mystery — not to impress kings or please critics, but to touch eternity with a brush. My inventions were dreams on paper, seeds planted in a future I would never see.

What drove me? Not fame, not gold — but an unquenchable thirst to understand why the sky is blue, how water moves, and what lies inside a smile.

And so, I say this to you: Never lose your wonder. Let your eyes see what others overlook, let your hands build what others doubt.

For in the end, life is brief, art endures, and knowledge is the light that never dims.

I was born to learn, to create, to question. And so are you.

Be curious... endlessly. That is how we fly, even without wings.

2. Shah Rukh Khan

"Success is not a good teacher, failure makes you humble."

I am Shah Rukh Khan — a man whose face is more famous than his real self. I've been called many things: hero, lover, outsider, even 'King Khan.' But behind all the glitter, there's a simple boy from Delhi who dared to dream when the world wasn't watching.

I arrived in Mumbai with just a suitcase and a heart full of hope. I danced in the rain, romanced the mountains, and cried in front of cameras — because cinema gave me a purpose, an identity, a life beyond my wildest dreams.

But let me tell you — fame is the weirdest truth. It isn't the flashbulbs or fans; it's the silence that follows when people forget you're human. Social media came and turned me into a 'meme,' a trending topic, a digital face. But I embraced it. I laughed at myself, because if you can't laugh at yourself, you're probably missing the funniest joke in the world.

My journey is a testimony: You don't need to be born extraordinary — you just need to be relentlessly yourself. And in the end, remember this — Live life like Shah Rukh Khan dances — arms wide open, heart full of love, unapologetically YOU.

Because when the lights go out and the applause fades, it's the kindness you gave, and the love you shared, that remains.

Picture abhi baaki hai mere dost... and your story is just getting started.

3. Lata Mangeshkar

"Mera sur, mera saath, mere bhagwan ke liye hai. Main toh bas ek zariya hoon."

I am Lata Mangeshkar — not just a voice, but a feeling that lived in the hearts of millions. I never chased fame, I only followed sur — that divine thread that connects the soul to the heavens.

From a small studio in Mumbai to the grandest stages of the world, I sang not for applause, but for emotion. Lag jaa gale, Ae mere watan ke logon, Tere bina zindagi se koi — these songs were not just melodies, they were prayers whispered through my voice.

I never saw music as a career. For me, it was a sadhana — a discipline, a devotion. There were days of struggle, sleepless nights, moments of pain, but when I sang, everything melted away. My voice belonged to the people — every mother, every soldier, every broken heart.

I didn't speak much, but my silence was filled with songs.

And today, I say to you — find your voice. It may not be in music, but let it be in kindness, in sincerity, in whatever you love. Because when you give your heart to your art, it speaks louder than words ever can.

Main chali jaaungi, lekin mera sur yahin rahega.

Let your work be your legacy — soft, powerful, eternal. Just like a song that never fades.
